The first inhabitants of this area were Native Americans who did not build permanent dwellings, but moved seasonally. The Beaudry family, who homesteaded in this area, were French-Canadian and are first listed in the 1880 census. They were and are hard-working dairy farmers who milk 70 or more cows a day at their farmstead near LaBeaux Avenue (CSAH 19) and 80th Street, with seldom a day off.

In 2002, the City of Otsego adopted plans for construction of the West Waste Water Treatment Facility to provide services for development of residential, commercial, and industrial land uses, north and east of the City of Albertville. The Beaudry family sold approximately 164 acres of their farm for development to the Darrel A. Farr Development Corporation. Farr Development in turn sold approximately 20 acres to the City as the site of the West Waste Water Treatment Facility. Farr Development also was the subdivider of Pleasant Creek Farms to the north of the Waste Water Treatment Facility. Arbor Creek was subdivided from land formerly part of the Beaudry Farm and the City acquired just over 10 acres of land as part of the platting process for development of the current neighborhood park.

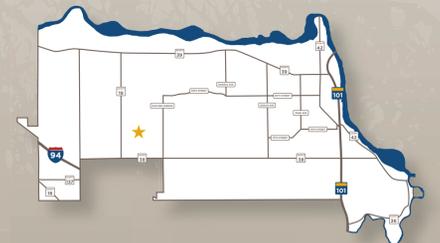

“Pride of Otsego” barn built by Alvin Frank and Alfred Beaudry. The blocks used for the building were made on the farm site. Dairy farming was conducted in this barn until 1998. It is still standing; can you find it?

Otsego Creek, which runs between the natural environment lake south of 70th Street in Albertville to the Mississippi River, crosses through the former Beaudry farm adjacent to the West Waste Water Treatment Facility and Beaudry Meadows Park. In the past, carp from the Mississippi River would swim into Otsego Creek and children would spear them with pitchforks and bring them home to clean and cook.
